Gender equality means giving men and women equal rights, opportunities, and respect in all areas of life. It ensures that both genders can participate freely in education, work, politics, and decision-making without discrimination. Gender empowerment goes hand in hand with equality — it helps individuals, especially women, gain confidence, independence, and control over their own lives. A society that treats everyone equally, regardless of gender, becomes stronger, fairer, and more progressive. In Nepal and around the world, awareness about gender equality is growing. More girls are going to school, and women are taking on leadership roles in politics, business, and education. However, challenges such as gender-based violence, unequal pay, and limited access to opportunities still exist. True empowerment requires changing traditional mindsets that limit women's potential. Families, schools, and communities must work together to promote equal rights and respect for all.
